ABOUT ME

My practice exists at the joining of fashion, performance, and the investigation of what it means to be human. I explore emotion, identity, memory, vulnerability, and social experience as embodied forms of expression.

Rooted in human-driven performances and their intersectionalities, my work approaches humanity not as a fixed condition, but as one of many possible ways of being. Through fashion design, I translate these inquiries into silhouettes, materials, textures, and visual narratives that move between garment and experience.

Driven by conceptual research, experimentation, and an intuitive sensitivity to the body, I see fashion as a space for transformation – where identity can be questioned, performed, fragmented, and reimaged. My work seeks to provoke perception, evoke emotion, and open new possibilities of being.

IMAGE

Creating mixed media is an essential part of my work and often extends beyond the decorative or promotional. It is a way to communicate how the work can be perceived, a certain angle positioned across from a viewer in attempt to steer a certain emotion, ignite curiosity, or as an interactive experiment. My understanding of 'image' comes from both autoethnographic approach, and through absorbing experiences of my surrounding.

My understanding of making is ever-evolving, and an open-ended quest. I do possess several personal techniques which I use often in my work, with different positioning of their role in the overall result. However, I attempt to maintain an open mind to explore new ways of making. For COLLECTION 13 I created a ritualistic system of disassembling older garments and creating a non-standard return into assembly to create new items.

COLLECTION 13

COLLECTION 0.1

Collection 0.1 marked a distinct point of intersection, where inquiries about craftsmanship and the composition of textiles meet personal reflections on coming of age and the family dynamics within.

In this project, two grand methods of manufacturing and experimentation were laid down as a base for the collection. The first being an interactive process with the digital embroidery machine, and the second being a majorly handmade approach.

The result was a dynamic show that included an OST and choreography mapping the intimate relationships expressed within

What remains at this stage is not a resolution, but a sustained engagement with conditions that refuse to stabilize. The embroidery does not arrive at a final form, nor does it settle into a defined methodology. It continues to operate as a site where interaction unfolds, where meanings emerge and dissolve, and where the boundaries between human and machine remain in flux.

The exhibition, in this sense, becomes an extension of the research rather than its conclusion. The space does not contain the work, but participates in its unfolding. Viewers become part of the interaction, encountering the manifestations without being directed toward a specific understanding. The presence of the reader supports this encounter, not by resolving ambiguity, but by sustaining it.

The prototype, therefore, does not resolve the questions that initiated it. Instead, it materializes certain aspects of the process while leaving others unresolved. It operates as a commitment to continuation, where the interaction between human and machine persists beyond the limits of a single outcome. What becomes concrete is not the meaning of the work, but the conditions under which meaning can continue to emerge, shift, and withdraw.

COLLECTION 24

For my master's in Critical Fashion Practices at ArtEZ, I examined intersections of tactile fashion projections and the positioning of machinery/non-human intelligence. The result was an exhibition of various surface designs that narrate a journey of interactions and loop-ed feed of information between the human and the non-human.
